

JibYourMentor

A six-month trading contest for Moroccan traders, ranked on independently verified live-account results.

Working document. Every version that matters will be rewritten after the third trader asks a question nobody anticipated.

1. What it is

A six-month contest. Traders enter with a live account that is already independently verified. At the end, the top five are published with their verified return. There is no entry fee, no prize money, and no revenue.

The contest is not the product. The product is a scoreboard people believe.

2. Why it exists

Retail trading in Morocco runs on screenshots. Mentorships are sold on results nobody can check, and there is no neutral place to see who is real. The platform serves two sides of that problem:

- Real traders get credibility they currently cannot prove.
- Beginners get a clear view of who is worth trusting before they pay anyone.

Existing contests do not fill this gap. Prop firm contests run on demo accounts with prizes as marketing spend — the leaderboard is a funnel to sell challenges. The Robbins Cup is the credibility benchmark, but it is US-centric, charges an entry fee, requires a $10,000 minimum, and routes every participant through its own broker pipeline.

The position that is open: verified, free, local, and with no financial stake in the outcome.

3. The deal for a participant

What they give

A public Myfxbook link to a live account they already trade, plus their full name and a social handle at registration. Nothing else. No fee, no new account, no money moved, no screenshots, no reporting, no password handed over, and no obligation to promote anything.

What they get

A placement verified by a party with no stake in the result — citable permanently. "Top 3, JibYourMentor 2026" is a line in a bio that no screenshot can imitate.

Why that is worth six months of exposure

Credibility converts to mentorship sales. Traders with real results have been competing against fabricated ones with no way to distinguish themselves. This is that way.

4. Entry requirement

Rule. Live MT4 or MT5 account at a tier-1 regulated broker, minimum $2,000 equivalent, with a public Myfxbook page showing both Track Record Verified and Trading Privileges Verified, connected before the window opens. Minimum 10 round-turn trades over the window for award eligibility.

Registration is: paste a link, give your name and handle.

Both badges are mandatory. Track Record Verified means Myfxbook pulls history directly from the broker server several times a day — the numbers come from the broker, not the trader. Trading Privileges Verified proves the account belongs to them, since it requires the master password an impostor would not hold. One badge alone is worthless here.

5. What is excluded, and why

Excluded	Reason
Futures accounts (NinjaTrader, Tradovate, Rithmic)	No independent verification infrastructure exists. Tradovate's API cannot be scoped read-only; NinjaTrader integration is local-only.
Interactive Brokers route	Technically viable via Flex token or PortfolioAnalyst, but it adds friction and creates a second, weaker standard of proof that we control.
Demo and simulated accounts	Kills the signal. Without real money the winner is whoever leveraged hardest.
Prop firm accounts	The firm's money under rules the firm can change. If you cannot fund $2,000, the claim to be a real trader is the thing in question.
Self-submitted statements or PDFs	Editable. Self-reported with extra steps.

The published stance: "We only rank what we can independently verify." Admitting the limit is stronger than accepting weaker proof.

6. Ranking

Metric. Raw net percentage return over the window, Robbins-style. No risk adjustment.

The $2,000 minimum is what makes this defensible: real money at risk is what disciplines leverage, and it is why demo leaderboards impress nobody. The 10-trade minimum closes the remaining hole — without it, a trader could take one oversized position in week one, double the account, sit out five months, and be certified as the country's best trader on a coin flip.

Measurement

Cutoff. Equity — not balance — at the last Myfxbook sync following market close on the final trading day of the window.

Equity captures open positions marked to market, so participants are free to hold trades through the close. Balance would not: an account holding open losers shows a rising balance line with equity far below it, which is the classic way a bad account looks good. Myfxbook syncs roughly hourly, not continuously, which is why the rule names a sync rather than a clock time. Publish this sentence before entries open and the argument never happens.

7. What gets published

When	What
At entry close	Full list of entrants — names and handles only
At window close	Top 5, with verified return
Never	Individual trades, live positions, ranks below 5

Why publish the entrant list. Anonymous entry turns the contest into a free lottery — enter, get named only if lucky. With the list public, entering is a public act, and not placing is visible without being humiliating.

Why no live feed. A trader with mentorship income is being asked to risk the thing that sells it. Trade-by-trade transparency maximises credibility and minimises sign-ups. Names public plus results at the end is the version people will actually sign.

8. Duration

Six months. One month is mostly noise — anyone can be lucky for four weeks. Six months means something, and it filters people unwilling to commit their image for that long. That filter is desirable.

Consequence to plan for: the first result is six months after launch. The entry announcement has to carry the entire period. Start the clock as early as possible.

9. Revenue

None, stated explicitly in the invitation. No entry fee. No prize. No broker sponsorship. No introducing-broker commissions. No ads.

This is the most persuasive sentence available — every trader reading it has been pitched by ten prop firms this year and knows what those were selling.

Why not broker sponsorship. The product is the absence of a stake in the outcome. A sponsor logo does not have to change a single decision to destroy the claim; it only has to make the claim arguable.

The counter-example, for honesty. Robbins Trading is itself a registered introducing broker and has stayed credible for forty years. What protects them is that the audit is mechanical and results are published regardless of who they flatter. So this is not an absolute law — but revisit sponsorship only once the badge has independent value. Not edition one.

Year one is self-funded. Decide that now rather than discovering it in month four.

10. Integrity rules — published and dated before entries open

- One account per person, declared at entry, cannot be changed mid-window.
- Entries close before the window starts. No exceptions, no late additions.
- A second undeclared account is a permanent ban, published.
- Verification must be live before the window opens or the entry is void.
- Signed sole-account declaration.
- Announcement by participants is required; endorsement is prohibited. Allowed: "I have entered, my account is verified, results are public." Not allowed: "This platform is amazing, go sign up."

The moment that decides everything. Sooner or later someone with a large audience breaks a rule, and you have to disqualify them publicly while they tell their followers you are biased. Every integrity project fails there, not at the marketing stage. The rules must be written and dated in advance, and you must have already decided you will enforce them against your biggest name. If you would not, the platform is decoration.

11. Status of decisions

Item	Status	Value
Ranking metric	Decided	Raw net return
Minimum trades	Decided	10 round-turn
Minimum account	Decided	$2,000 equivalent
Prop firm accounts	Decided	Not eligible
Prize	Decided	None
Duration	Decided	Six months
Registration fields	Decided	Full name, social handle, Myfxbook link
Platform name	Open	JibYourMentor, provisional
Legal check	Open	Any Moroccan jeu-concours requirement with no prize and no fee — likely trivial, confirm anyway
Will a real trader say yes	Open	The only test that matters. Costs one message.

On the name. Jib your mentor is memorable and speaks to beginners, who are half the audience. But read from a mentor's side it sounds like bring your mentor here and let us expose him — and mentors are the entire supply side. Decide which side the name should speak to.

12. The risk nobody mentions

A public verified leaderboard is documentary evidence. It publishes named Moroccan residents alongside proof of foreign trading accounts and returns — audited, dated, permanent. For most participants that is fine. For any who have not declared foreign holdings, it creates the cleanest possible public record of it.

That risk belongs to them, but you are creating it. This is precisely why the design reads accounts they already have rather than mandating a broker: if participants must open and fund a new foreign account to enter, you become the reason the transfer happened. Same outcome for them, very different exposure for you.

13. What is actually hard

The code is a leaderboard and a list of links — perhaps 15% of the effort. The real work is attention: getting the Moroccan trading scene to care, month after month, before there is any money in it.

The distribution mechanism is the participants themselves. Ten traders with real followings, one announcement each, zero ad spend. That is why the guru angle matters — they are the marketing.

Adverse selection. The payoff is credibility that sells mentorship, so the people with the most mentorship income have the most to lose from a verified drawdown. The traders who enter will be the ones who quietly believe they are real. The loudest ones — whose participation would make it a spectacle — are precisely the ones most likely to decline. That is either fatal or it is the entire product.

14. Sequence

- Test the premise first. Reach three or four traders you believe are genuine. Read the reason, not the answer: "I do not want my drawdown public" is a design problem and fixable. "Who are you?" is solved by the page. Silence means you lack standing to reach them yet. A brush-off from someone loud costs nothing and confirms what you suspected.
- Landing page. What this is, the rules, the dates, the entrant list. Static. The leaderboard does not need to exist for six months.
- Email Myfxbook in parallel. Two questions: would they support a verified contest formally, and is there programmatic access to public account stats. If yes, it is a credibility stamp you could not buy. If they never reply, nothing changes.
- Invitations once the page exists, so the ask is not a stranger's message.
